Poetry.
AN OLD STORY.

Fisherman John is brave and strong.
None more brave on the coast than he;
He owns a cottage and fishing smack As snug as ever need be.
And what is truer than I could wish, Fisherman John loves me.

Often and often, when day is done, With smiling lips and eager eyes He comes to woo me; in every way That a man may try he tries To win me; but that he can never do, Though he woo me till he dies.

Fisherman Jack is a poorer man;
He owns no cottage nor fishing smack.
But winning voice and smile are his,
And a manly grace. Alack!
It will not break my heart to tell That I love Fisherman Jack.

He loves not me; but every night He sits at the feet of Kate Mahon; Never a heart has she made for him—For she loves Fisherman John, Who cares no more for love of hers Than the sea he sails upon.

Often we wonder, do Kate and I,
That fate should cross us so cruelly;
We think of the lovers we do not love, And dream of what life would be,
If only Fisherman John loved her,
And Fisherman Jack loved me.

"MAMMA."

A Sketch from Real Life.

'Do you suppose mamma will come into the room to-night?'

'I hope not; for her sake as well as our case. She is always miserably ill at case.'

'It is very different with papa. I am proud to introduce him everywhere at all times.'

'Mamma is a good woman, Carry.'

'One of the best and dearest in the world, Kate.'

'But hopelessly behind the age, and us.'

'Don't enlarge upon that point, dear.

She is socially and aesthetically impracticable; and the speaker's voice shuddered as at the scratch of steel up on glass. It hurts me to admit it. I cannot divest myself of the fancy that there is a usefulness in my mortification, when I grow cold and hot by turns in watching what she would call her 'company manners.'

'Not a word more, Carry, or I shall confess my own shameful lack of moral courage. This whole discussion is worse than unprofitable. Mamma is mamma! All our wishing and talking cannot transform her into our re-financed and gracious ideal matron. The best we can hope for is to keep her in the background where there are those present who would be unfavorably impressed by her solicitations.'

The twin-sisters—blondes, with fair, puffy hair, blue eyes and soft-tinted cheeks, delicate of feature and vivacious speech—sat at the library table, folding and directing invitations to their twenty-first birthday party. In the dialogue above recorded, there was not a touch of asperity or ill-humor. As a rule, they were in thorough accord with each other, and suited the comfortably padded, perfumed world in which they lived as well as it suited them.

But the attractive, perfumed self-seeking world had made them supercilious and cold-hearted. It had shriveled the love of their childhood for their mother, until it was so faint and weak that it could not accept and overlook her faults of education and of et-was ambitious. It was to please and help him that she worked as diligently at home as she did abroad; had risen early, laid down late, and eaten the in-nutritious bread of carefulness for twenty-six years.

She had borne six children, all of whom were alive and healthy. She was a cook and model housewife; an expert seamstress and economist; feared God; honored as a king her husband; served as princes and princesses the children she had given him.

Years ago she had seen that her lord and master had grown away from her mentally. The friction of other minds had brightened and developed the powers of a naturally excellent intellect; the exigencies of business had thrown him into competition that was in itself an education.

The discovery had not troubled her seriously. He was the stronger vessel.
St. Paul and nature taught her to look up to him. So long as he loved her, liked to have her sit near him in the evening, the Argand burner that illuminated his books or letters shedding light upon her mending-basket, she was content.

Her children filled, colored, glorified her life. Being shy, undemonstrative and unlearned, she could not have put this into words, but surely they must have known it.

Her husband's wealth, their own personal endowments, beauty, intelligence and tact had opened to them the doors of the 'best society'—a fact that elated, but did not surprise her.

'They deserved the highest places the world could give—being, as we have said, royal in themselves. In her quiet way, she enjoyed seeing their social triumphs.'

Her daughters had smiled at her 'company manners.' She had done her best—it appeared now in the wrong direction. As by a flash of lightning through a river roof, she saw that in service for others she had forgotten herself, and to her hurt.

'What a draught!' Carry broke off her work to say. 'I will shut the library-door.'

The heavy leaves rolled together and the back room was silent and dark and before.

'Shut out in the cold!'

The faded lips whispered it, and the heavy eyes responded in bitter tears.

The mother got up, clasping her forehead to steady her thoughts, and groped silently from the room, lest the girls should suspect they had been overheard.

Stealthily she crept in the opposite apartment. The twins spoke of it as 'the drawing-room.' It was English and sounded well. Mechanics' wives and small trades people had parlors.

They had good taste, those sunny-haired sisters. Their visitors had said so often that the newly-furnished rooms were the most artistic in the city, that it was easy to believe this.

All that harmony of tints, richness of material, well-chosen decorations could do, contributed to the agreeable effectiveness of the whole.

In the midst of the luxuriant space, the nominal mistress paused to survey her image in the mirror built into the wall between the front windows. Another tall glass in the far depths of the carpeted vista repeated and multiplied the forlorn figure, in scanty black merino, linen collar and white apron. A chambermaid would have been 'smarter.'
